(New York, NY)— On November 7, 2014, the administration relieved the former chief of the New York City Human Rights Commission, following criticism from Public Advocate Letitia James on inactivity within the commission. Today, New York City Public Advocate Letitia James released the following statement:

“Over the past several months, I have been deeply concerned about inactivity at the Human Rights Commission, New Yorkers deserve a Human Rights Commission that is functioning and aggressive when it comes to protecting the rights of our residents,” said New York City Public Advocate Letitia James. “I commend Mayor de Blasio on today's announcement and look forward to closely working with the Commission and ensuring that its mission to safeguard New Yorkers is achieved with a diligence and a sense of urgency.”
